Cotton is ever a subject of deep interest to the southern public. Profitable when successfully cultivated above perhaps any other agricultural product, it is still one of the most sensitive and unreliable productions of the farm. No acreage, how much cotton he will raise, or, indeed, whether he will gather anything like a sufficiency to pay him for his outlay of money, toil and trouble, until the crop is in his gin house. Even then some unexpected calamity at home or abroad, may bring down the price of the great staple to a starving figure. Still, there is money in the business of cotton-plant-
